It is good to be the king!

Hexagonie was such a big kingdom that it needed an important king to rule the country. The king of Hexagonie was called "Le Roi Être" which meant "King To Be".

King Être lived with the queen in their beautiful palace. He was good at being king and was respected by all the nouns who were his subjects.

Depending on the occasion King Être knew how to be kind and happy as well as firm and strict if necessary. Even though he could also be grumpy at times, all the nouns could not "be" without him. It was thanks to him that they existed.

Every noun in the kingdom dreamed of being introduced to King Être. And when they had the good fortune of being granted an audience with the king, the nouns could not believe it! They would repeat over and over "C'est incroyable! Ce n'est pas possible!" ("It's incredible! It's not possible!")

During the meeting, the king would be seated on his magnificent golden throne, on which was engraved: "Le Roi, c'est moi!" ("The King, it's me!"). The king would always start the conversation asking, "Qui es-tu?" ("Who are you?") and the nouns would respectfully say their names, replying, "Je suis une lampe," "Je suis un coussin."

After their royal audience, the nouns would be so happy to have met King Être that for months afterwards they would talk about it proudly.
